Last November I had a nightmare. It was 1924 and I was at Riverton again. All the doors hung wide open, silk moving in the summer breeze. An orchestra perched high on the hill beneath the ancient maple, violin music melting lazily in the warmth. The air rang with laughter and the sky was the kind of blue we'd all thought the war had destroyed forever. I saw myself, the way one does in dreams, moving amongst the guests. Moving slowly, much more slowly than one can in real life. I was looking for someone. Then the picture changed and I was near the summer house, only it wasn't the summer house at Riverton I loved so much. This was not the shiny new building Teddy had built but an old structure with ivy climbing the walls, twisting itself through the windows. Someone was calling me. A voice I recognized. It was coming from behind the building on the lake's edge. And then I saw her. Hannah was wearing a wedding dress, mud splattered across the front. She looked up at me, her face pale where it emerged from shadow. 'You're too late,' she said. And then I woke up.

I know what brought it on, of course. It was the letter from the filmmaker. I don't receive much mail these days: the occasional postcard from a holidaying friend; a letter from the bank where I keep a savings account; an invitation to the christening of a child whose parents I am shocked to realize are no longer children themselves.

The letter had arrived on a Tuesday morning late in November and Sylvia had brought it with her when she came to make my bed and do the laundry. She'd raised heavily made-up eyebrows and waved the envelope.

'Mail today. Something from the States by the look of the stamp. Your grandson, perhaps?'

I gave her the weekly £50 and opened the letter. But it wasn't from Marcus at all. It was from a young woman, Ursula Ryan, making a film about the past. She wanted me to look at her sets, to remember things and places from long ago, to tell her what our life was like back then. As if I hadn't spent a lifetime pretending to forget.

At first, I ignored that letter. I folded it carefully and slid it inside a book I'd long ago given up reading. But I couldn't stop thinking about it. The letter brought back to my mind the tragic events connected with Robbie and the Hartford sisters. I remembered a documentary I had watched months ago. Robbie's face on the screen and his name printed across the bottom made my skin prickle. But nothing more happened. There was no mention of either Emmeline or Hannah.

Another time, reading the newspaper, my eye was drawn to Emmeline's name in a write-up in the television guide; a program celebrating seventy years of British films. I noted the time, wondering if I dared watch it. In the end I fell asleep before it finished. There was very little about Emmeline. A few publicity photos, none of which showed her true beauty, and a clip from one of her silent films.

But these previous situations didn't involve me. Ursula's letter was different. It was the first time in over seventy years that anyone had associated me with the events, had remembered that a young woman named Grace Reeves had been at Riverton that summer. It made me feel vulnerable somehow, singled out, guilty.

No. I was certain. That letter would remain unanswered.

And so it did.

Strange things began to happen, though. Memories pushed back to the dark corners of my mind a long time ago, began to sneak through cracks. I have surprised myself. While moths have torn holes in my recent memories, I find the distant past is sharp and clear. Lately these ghosts from the past come much more often, and I am surprised to find I don't mind them. Not nearly so much as I had supposed I would. I had forgotten, I suppose, that there were some bright memories in amongst the dark.

When the second letter arrived last week I knew I was going to say yes, I would look at the sets. I was curious, a sensation I hadn't felt in some time. There is not much left to be curious about when one is ninety-eight years old, but I wanted to meet this Ursula Ryan who plans to bring all these people to life again, who is so passionate about their story. So I wrote her a letter, had Sylvia post it for me and we arranged to meet.

adapted from House at Riverton by Kate Morton

A BRIT IN THE USA REPORTS

Some days ago I was sitting in my New York flat watching the CBS Sunday Morning News, probably the most prestigious and serious news show on commercial TV in America. Its entertainment section featured a long interview with Susan Boyle, a Scottish woman who won the Britain's Got Talent show. The interview was remarkable. 8.1. _____ It was rather so because it carried subtitles in English so that Americans could understand her!

It's true that some British accents are impenetrable to many foreign ears, sometimes even hard to understand in other parts of the UK. 8.2. _____ Obviously, CBS thought otherwise.

I suspect this may be the start of a trend. Some British movies now carry subtitles in America when there are strong regional accents. I've even heard some English southerners demand subtitles when certain Scottish trade unionists are on TV.

The diversity of British voices is one of our glories, but if you can't be understood even by other English-speaking countries, then clearly there is a problem. 8.3. _____ For example, Princess Anne had a tough time being understood when she visited some teenagers in New York during her visit to the States.

I have appeared regularly on US TV for almost three decades now, and fortunately, no US broadcaster has yet found it necessary to use subtitles. 8.4. _____ In matters of the heart it's dangerous to be misunderstood.

www.bbc.co.uk

- A. Even I struggled to understand some folk when I was back in the Glasgow region recently.
- B. I should add that some Americans also find very upper-class British accents hard to understand.
- C. CBS explained that her Scottish accent was 'a little difficult' to understand.
- D. Just to be sure, however, I think I'll take an interpreter to my Valentine's Day lunch.
- E. Not because of anything that was said, though.
- F. But I wouldn't have thought Ms Boyle's accent that hard to decipher among her fellow Brits or even Americans.
